Wilderness Emergency Medical Education offers this certification program with the support of Stonehearth Open Learning Opportunities (SOLO).

Acknowledgement of Risk

Wilderness Emergency Medical Education concentrates on delivering interactive, experiential training that reinforces long-term learning. Through continuously active participation in repetitive psychomotor skills, students learn how to properly respond and treat remote medical emergencies. This type of active learning is combined with thought provoking classroom discussion and lecture.

You will at some point during this training act as a rescuer (and be a patient) for assessments and treatments which means physical contact with co-participant. You will be expected to be an active participant in this training. You may participate in simulations that have you travel through uneven terrain and you may be exposed to inclement and potentially cold weather. You may be asked to lift or help carry patients. Due to the nature of the course activities and environment there is a chance that you could be injured. Wilderness Emergency Medical Education cannot guarantee your safety or well-being.

Participant Agreement

I acknowledge that there are certain risks associated with this experiential wilderness medical training course and I understand the risk as it has been described herein. If I have any condition that could affect my ability to participate, or if I ever feel that I am unable to complete a skill or activity without endangering my or someone else's well-being, or if I ever find myself in an uncomfortable or potentially dangerous situation during this training, I agree to immediately notify my instructor.
